

4)

3.

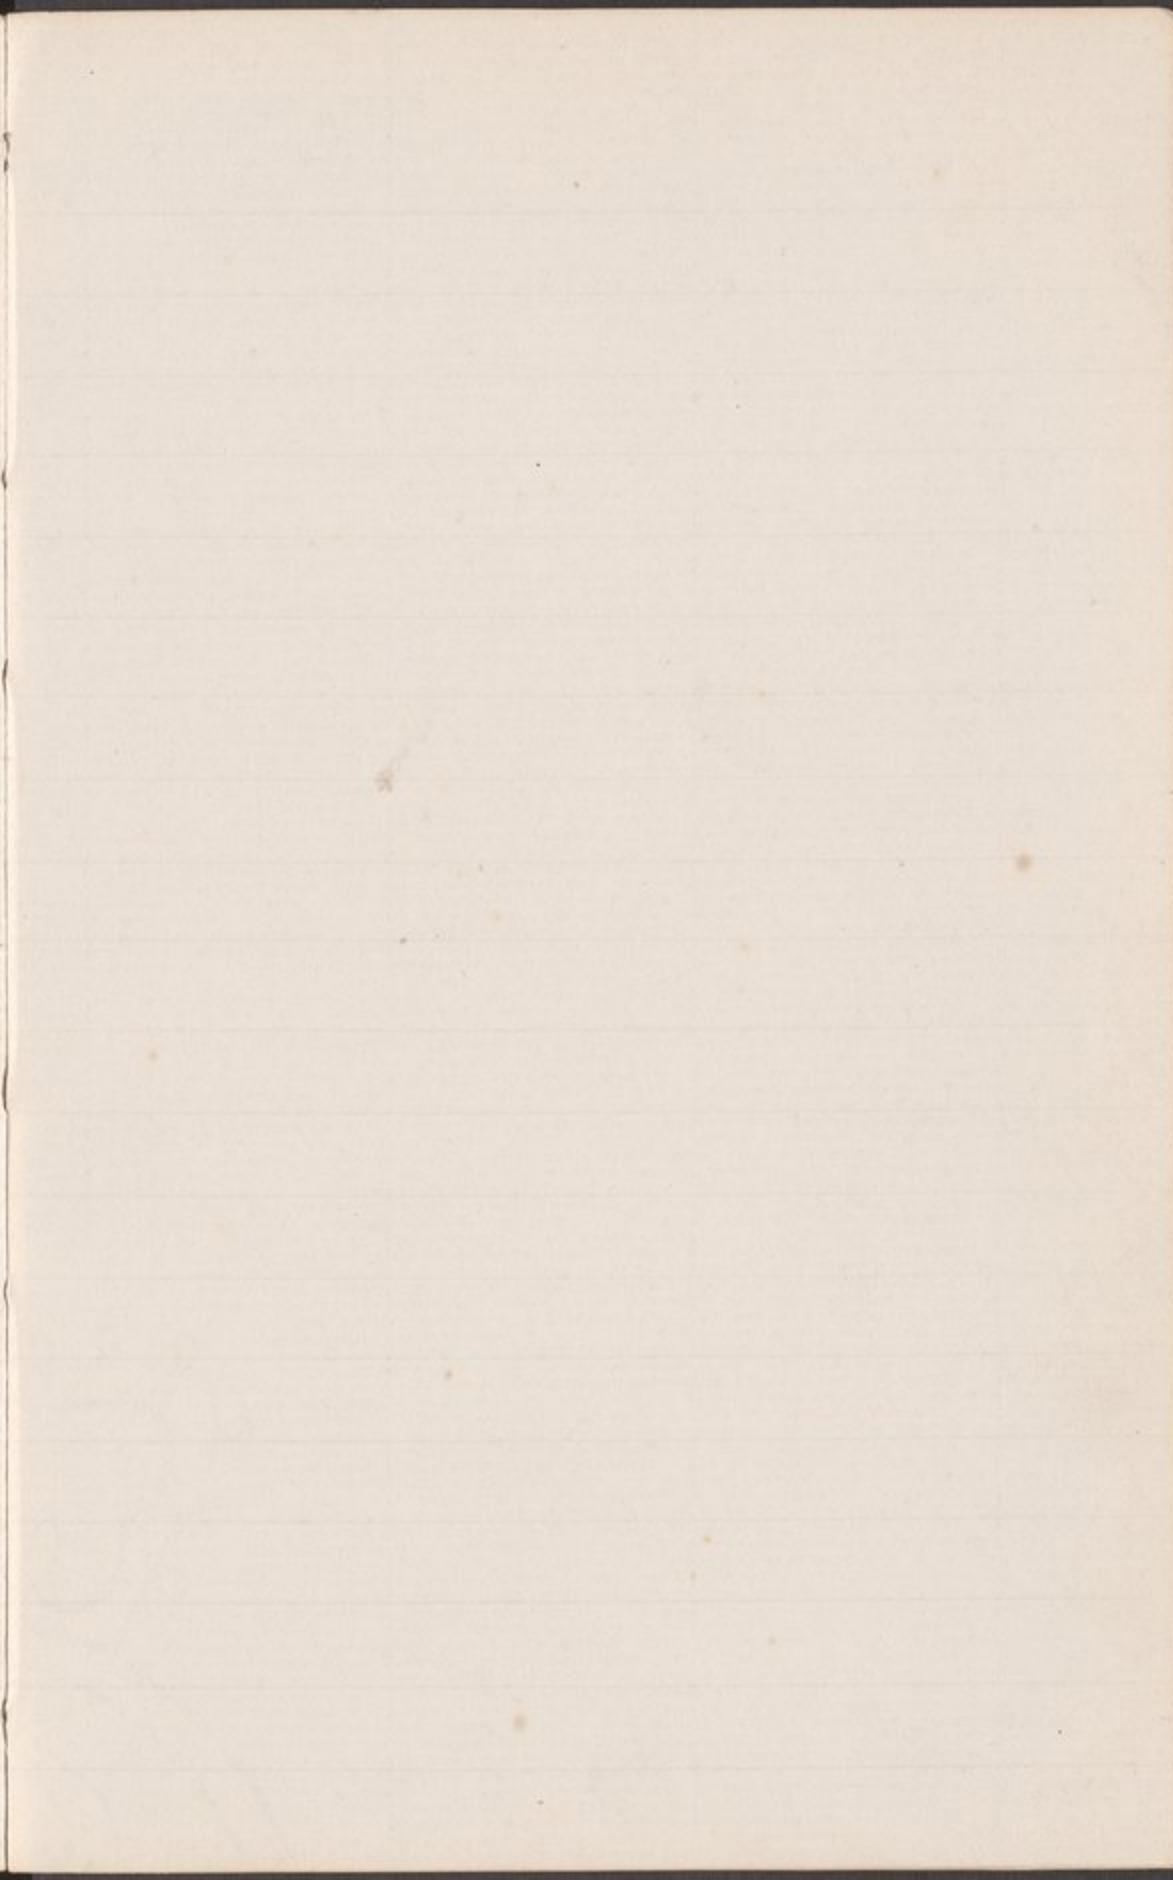

Vera Lowe
With best love & good Christmas wishes
from Cousin Nellie.

Xmas 1888.

i/c

9610P

P/x/x

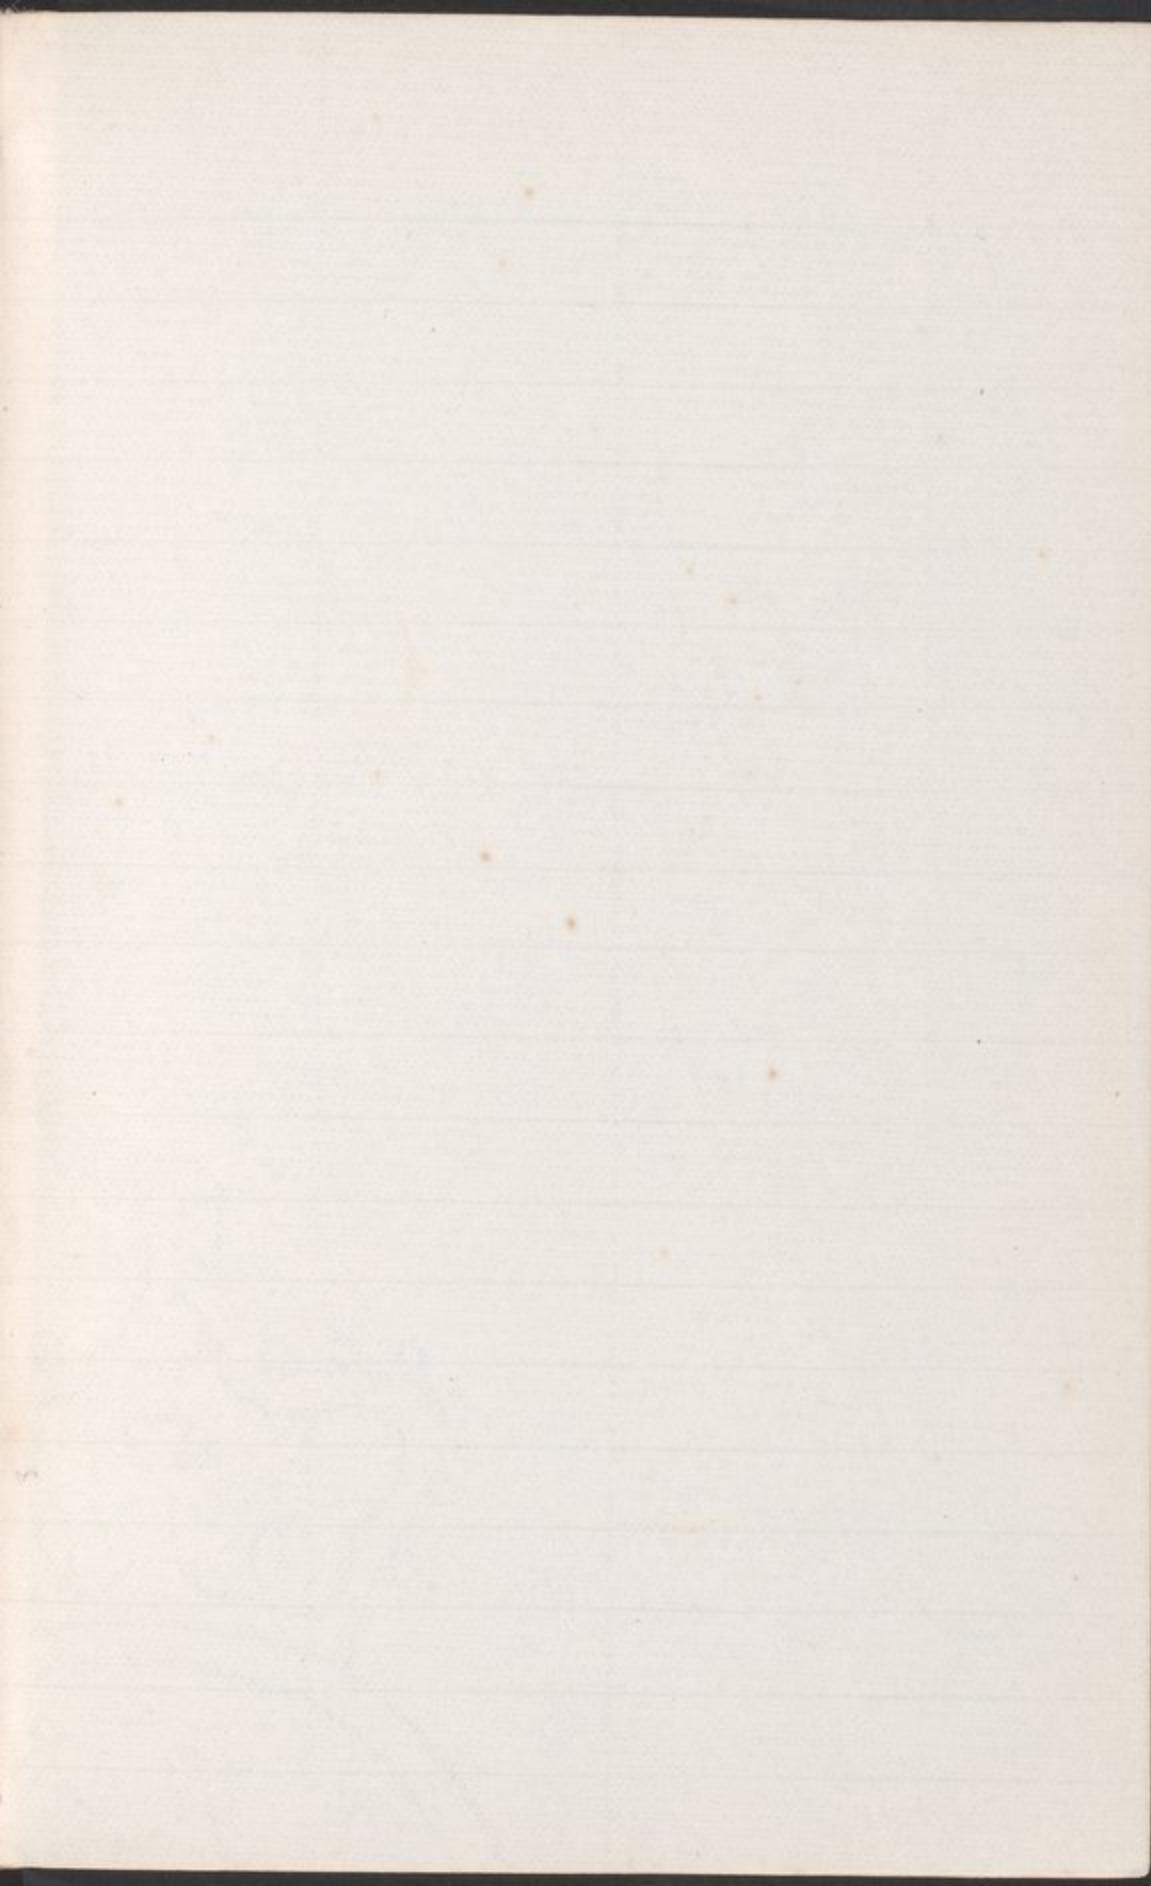

17. 10. 1861

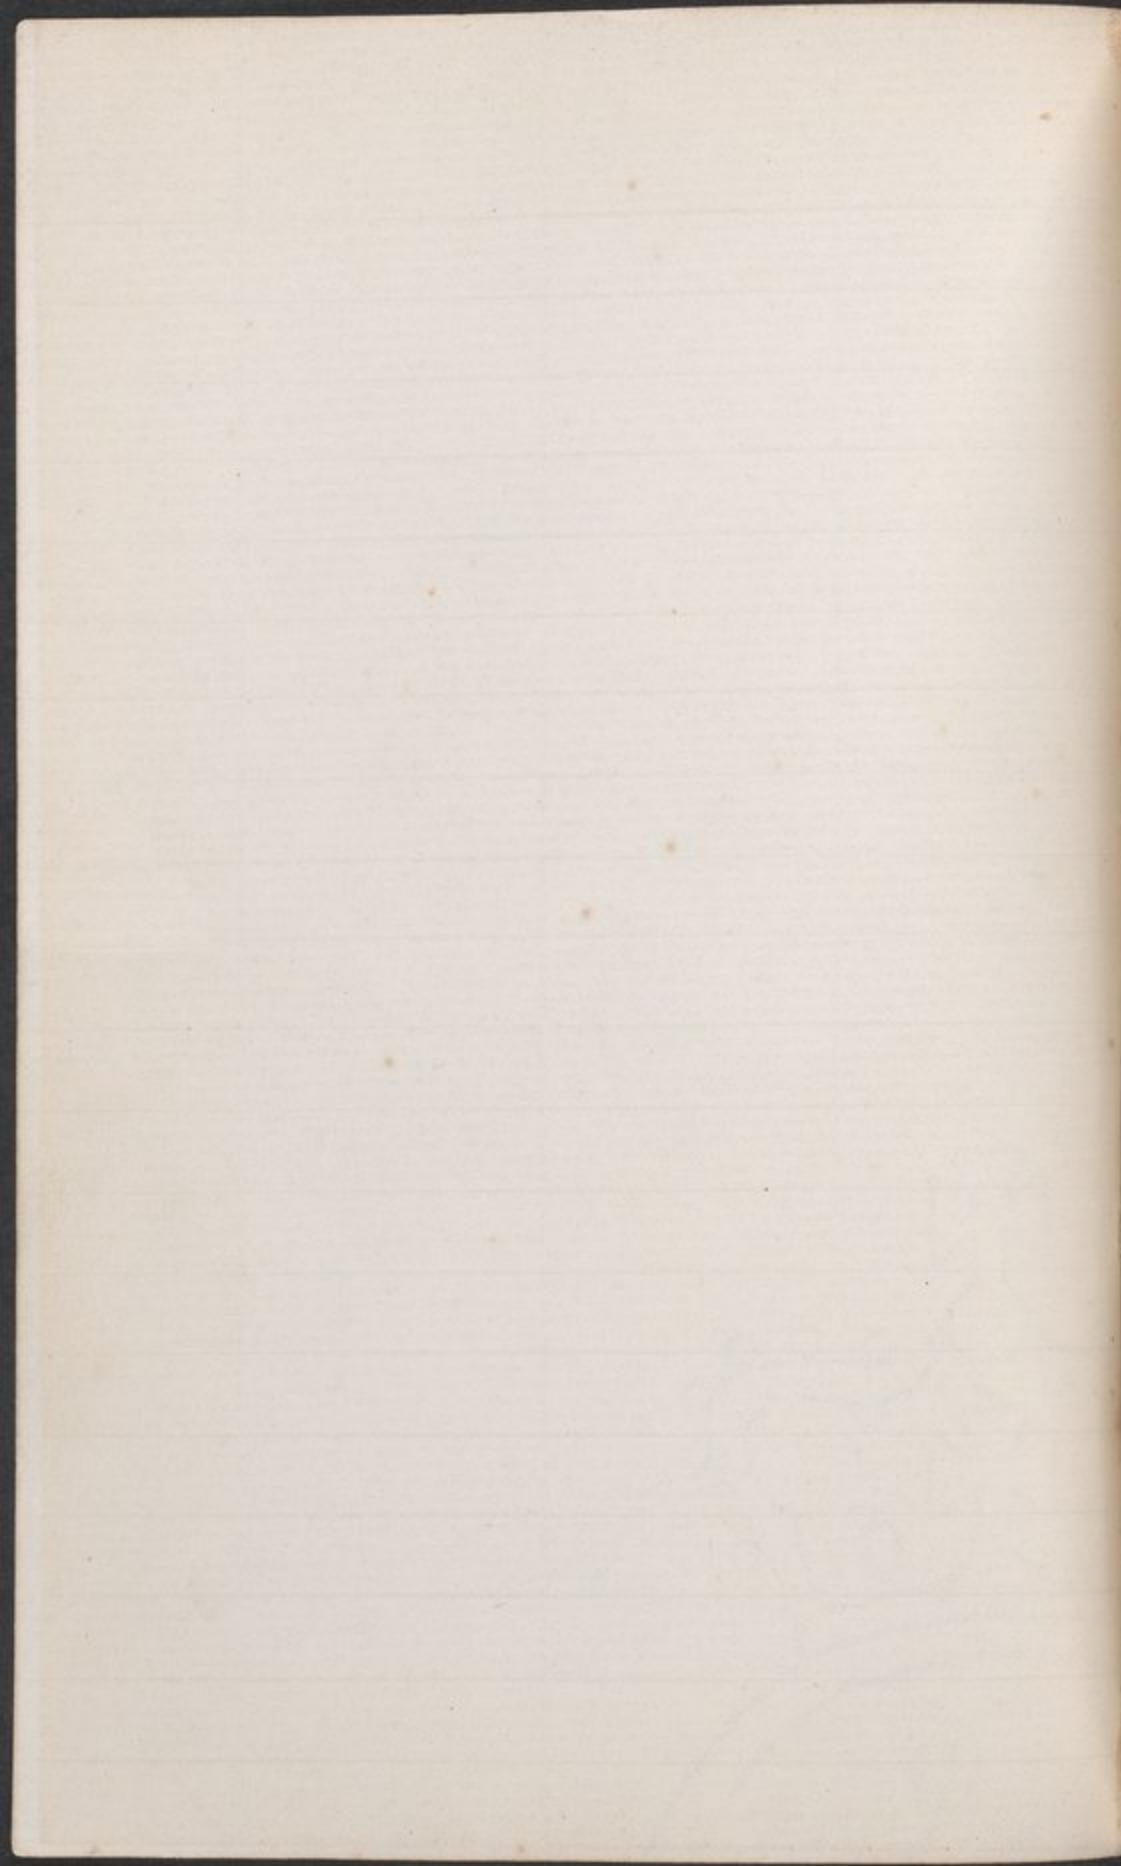

17. 10. 1861

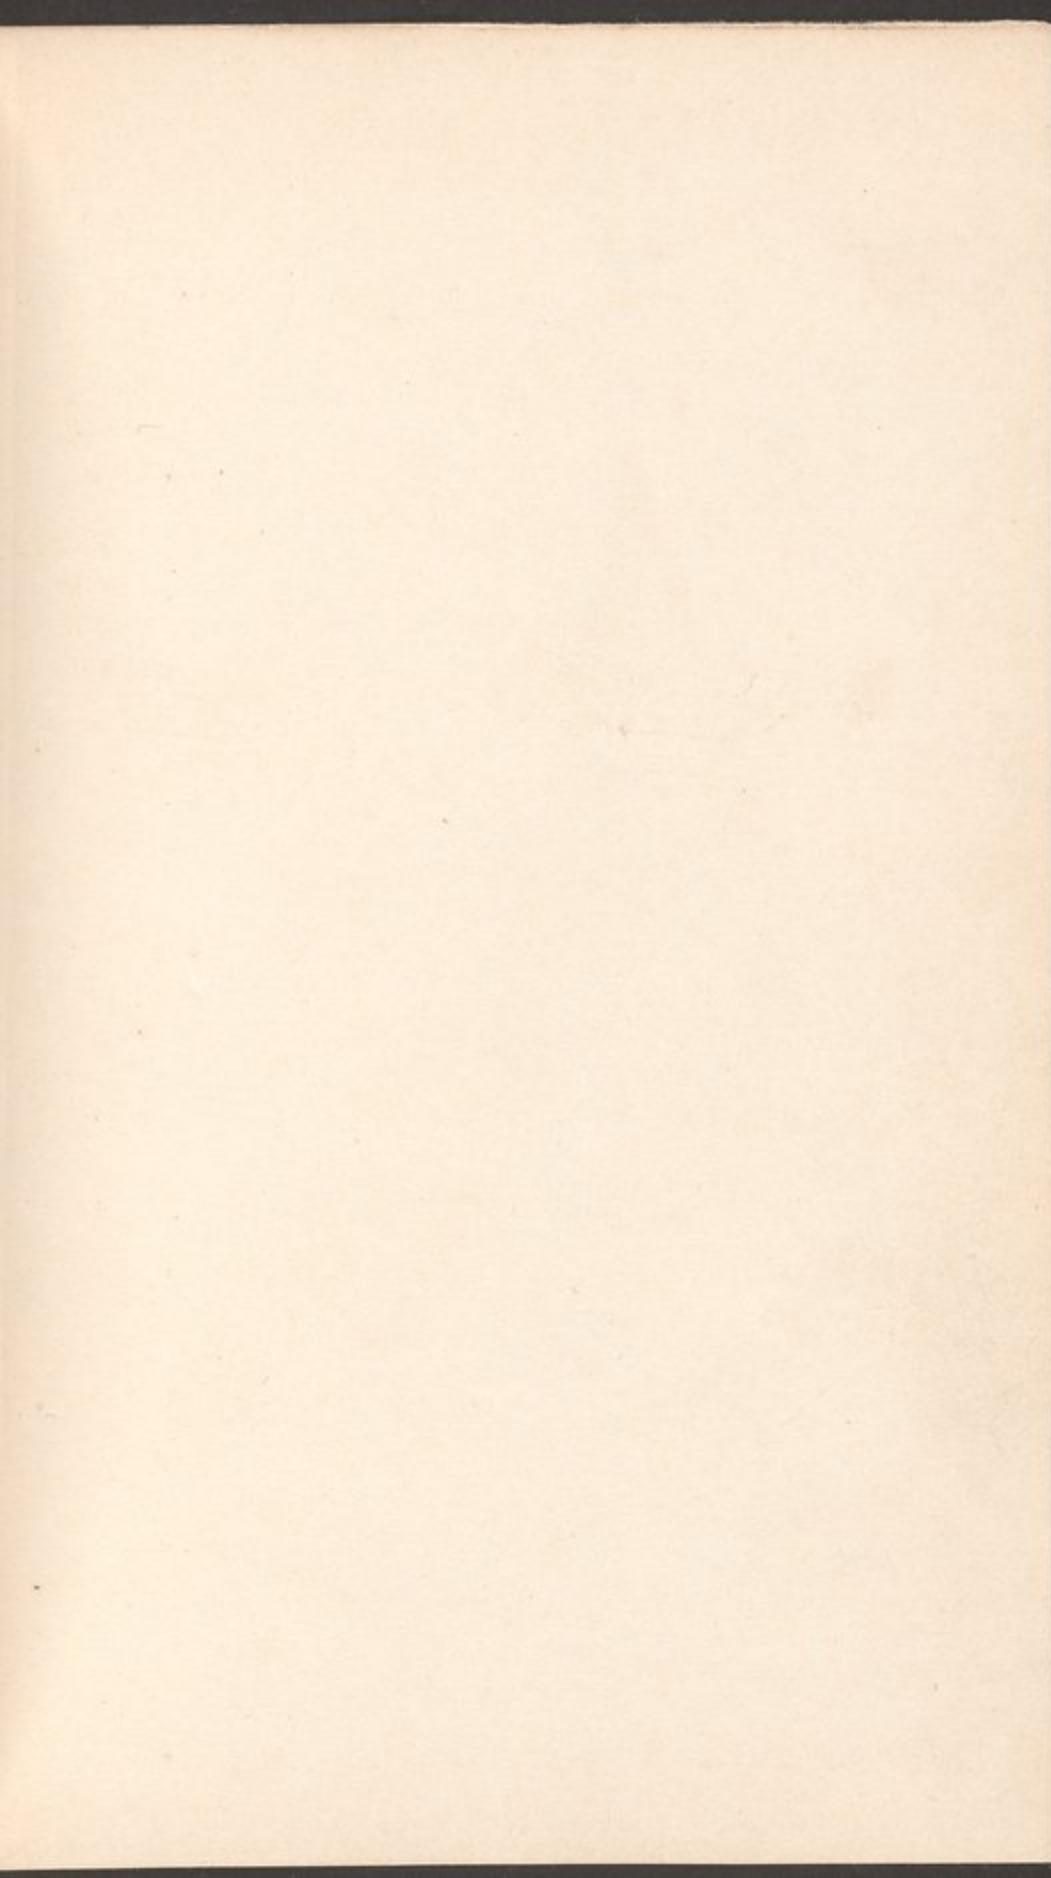

DWARF
STORIES
—|||—
BY EMP.

— " —

MARY
S. STOEGE
1986
HOME

E.H.P.
1885.

THE DWARF with the YELLOW NOSE

Many thousand years ago, in a land far away from England, there lived a King & Queen who needed but one thing to make their happiness complete, & that was a son to cheer them in their old age, & to inherit the kingdom at their death.

When at length a little son was born to them, everybody was nearly mad with joy. "The Court Chronicle" declared him to be the loveliest child that ever was born, while the "Court Circular" remarked that he seemed subject to none of the ills of childhood. & called him "A Radiant Being," a "Star of Beauty," & a "Pearl of Perfection." and really he was a very pretty boy, & would have been so whether he had been born a Prince or a Cobbler.

Moreover his nature was as sweet as his face, & in spite of everything that every body could do to spoil him, nobody could succeed in spoiling him a bit.

Everything that the child did, or did not do, was considered by the "Chronicle" & the "Circular" to be remarkable, even to the cutting of his first tooth; Indeed when that small piece of wire appeared, telegrams were sent to all the most important personages in the Realm, & what is more, to all the Principal cities of Europe to announce the fact. after which all the important Personages in the Realm, felt still more important, & all the principal cities added a post letter to their names to commemorate the event, & to prove to all future generations that they were Principal cities.

With the cutting of his first double tooth, a new ornament in Architecture came in, which was named after the event & keeps its name to this day; & the telegrams which were sent out to announce the fact, were written on a new issue of paper woven for the occasion, the colour of which was bright blue instead of orange.

As on this unfortunate tooth hangs all the rest of my tale, I must be particular in telling you what happened -

The Telegraph-boy, finding his legs rather tired after running at the top of his speed for a hundred & twenty miles without stopping, took the liberty of posting the telegram instead of delivering it in person. &, in the dusk of a summer evening, mistaking a common pump for one of His Majesty's Pillar Post - the letter was dropped thro' the mouth of the pump, & affecting the colour of the water, turned all the milk in the neighbourhood sky blue.

The telegram of course
never reached its destination, & as nobody likes to be the one person left out when others are remembered (especially when to be left out implies that you are not a person of consequence) and as in this case the person omitted was an old, influential, & irritable Fairy, who had as it happened been gathering gooseberries that very morning & had pricked her finger rather badly (a circumstance which had not improved a temper to say the least of it "short" at the best,) the consequences to the young Prince, & indeed to the Kingdom at large, were disastrous. For that very night as the infant Prince was sleeping sweetly in his wavy cot, the Fairy made her way unseen into the nursery, as Fairies have a habit of doing sometimes, & touching his Infant Majesty's bewitching little turned up nose left the room as noiselessly as he had entered it. The nurse was soon afterwards awakened by a sound as though a hundred pigs were grunting & squeaking together, & starting up in affright to see what danger threatened her Princeely charge, saw lying in the cradle a hideous mis-shapen thing whom she took to be a changeling, snoring through a huge yellow nose, that filled the cradle & was obliged to accommodate some of its superfluous length on the floor.

Her cries raised the household, everybody, from the King to the little boy who blacked his Majesty's boots, rushed into the nursery, & the scene that followed was heart-rending. The King & Queen died of grief on the spot: the nurse went into hy-sterics, the boot-boy dropped his blacking pot on the floor, & spoilt a new carpet, embroidered (in touching allusion to the Infants' dental achievements) with a double dogtooth pattern, which had only been laid down the day before: & the whole Palace was in confusion -

When at last the Court Physician could gain any attention, a search for the missing Prince was instituted, while the real child lay in his cradle, crying tears of hunger & loneliness down his long nose, till, having exhausted himself in this fashion, he discovered with the ingenuity of Childhood what a capital plaything might be made of it: & began to stroke & caress that part of it which was within his reach.

In the meantime everybody had cleared out of the Palace to search for the missing child, while the poor little Prince for whom they were searching, would infallibly have died of hunger & neglect, had not a poor Herdsman who stole into the empty rooms to see how "the Quality" live when they are at home, found him fast asleep, & snoring, in his cot, & out of compassion taken him home to his wife, who being a motherly woman took the child (nose & all) to her heart, & treated him as her own son.

That night a dream came to the old Herdsman & his wife, the same dream to each, in which it was made known to them, that only by marrying a beautiful Princess could the spell which was cast over the child be broken. But what chance was there of such good fortune happening to one who was brought up in a Herdsman's cot, & who snored through three feet of yellow nose !

Never the less the Herdsman & his wife being sensible people believed in the dream, & being discreet ones, kept silence about it: but for all their sense, & all their discretion they did not know how to accomplish the feat of prevailing upon a beautiful Princess to fall in love with the yellow nose.

Years passed away, &

the yellow nose grew no shorter, & unfortunately the young Prince grew but little taller, so that the proportion between the two was but little decreased. His appearance too, though not taking in private life, attracted the attention of an Ambassador from a foreign Court, who was sent in search of a Court Fool, & so it came to pass that our young friend the Prince found himself one day adored with a cap & bells, & seated on the lowest step of the King's throne to make sport for the King & his nobles.

His Foster parents nearly roke their hearts at parting with ~~them~~ him, but they comforted themselves with the thought, "Now at any rate he will be in the company of beautiful Princesses, & if by good luck one might be born blind!".....

So the Prince sat on the lowest step of the Dais, & made sport for the people: but he was often sad. & his work was repugnant to him for in his ugly body he carried a beautiful soul.

Lovely children sported on the velvet lawns, graceful Princesses paced the pleached alleys of the Palace gardens, (my little friends do you know what pleached alleys are? I do not,

but it is fitting that the alleys of a King's garden should be bleached, so we may be sure that these were so.) but no one cast a glance of affection or sympathy on the Dwarf with the yellow nose. The kindest glance that was ever bestowed upon him was one of pity or compassion, but love & sympathy were unknown to him.

And being lonely, he would wander away from the crowd of courtiers who surrounded the throne, to a lovely fountain which sent up diamond drops into the sunshine, to be caught in a crystal basin below, & throwing himself down upon the grass by its side, he would dream away half his days, forgetting in the beauty of nature the hardness of his lot, & cherishing a wild hope that some day that within him which he knew to be beautiful, would break through the shell which hid it from the world; & ever the image of a lovely face, pure & bright, the face of his Princess, floated before the eyes of his soul.

And one day that image became a reality, & this was how it happened.

He was leaning over the brim of the fountain, his heart filled with longing, & his eyes with tears that slowly & painfully found their way down his long nose; when a radiantly beautiful face looked over his shoulder into the crystal depths below, & in those depths he saw reflected the vision of his dreams. The face was fair as a lily, the cheek downy as a peach, & the little ear was curved like a transparent shell, while the hair that flowed down below the waist, shone like threads of gold -

But the rounded shoulder escaped from the tattered shoulder-strap, & the rosy tipped toes peeped out from the torn shoe, - for she was a beggar maiden.

The vision was so bright that it might have been sent by some good fairy to cheer his loneliness.

If she had only been a Princess,
— But she was a Beggar girl.—

And being a beggar girl, she did not turn away from his de-formity; & being like himself lonely, she often sought the fountain, & having a gentle & loving heart, she saw by some strange insight only given to the pure in spirit, the beauty of his soul shine through its outer shell: & they grew to be friends. And he loved her: but only as his sister, he would say to himself. only as his dear sister. For if he married a beggar girl he would never regain his original form, & horrible thought, — he would always more!

And so day after day they met at the fountain, & day after day they grew to love each other more, & day after day he reminded himself that his only chance of release was to marry a Princess: - and the Princess did not come.

And one day as the Prince & the Beggar girl leant side by side over the brink of the fountain, there was a sudden cry & a splash, & the little Beggar girl fell over the side into the water. How it happened nobody ever knew, but he always thought that some unseen hand had pushed her into the water. And oh! terrible fate for the Prince

he was not tall enough to climb over the side of the fountain to her rescue. He wringing his hands in despair as he saw the beautiful face disappear under the water; when a thought struck him, & climbing up as far as he could reach, he dropped his nose over the side of the basin, the child with a great effort contrived to grasp it, & in another moment she had climbed up it. & was lying dripping & exhausted on the ground at his feet.

How he thanked his nose that day, how heartily he forgave it for being long & even yellow! as he saw the foun-

of her whom he loved stretched on a bed of moss by the mountain's edge. For he loved her!
Yes, he knew it now; loved her as never sister was loved by brother, loved her so that the Princess must be forgotten & he must have her for his Bride.

He knelt down by her side & solemnly blessed his nose! - determined to take it with him to his dying day, rather than part with her whom he loved. Then raising her in his arms, he kissed her passionately & cried, "Child, child, will you be my wife?" and looking past the yellow nose, into the kindly eyes, he gravely answered, "I will."

No sooner had she said the words, than with a shock like that from an electric battery ran through them, & he stood by her side a beautiful Prince in black velvet & rubies, while she stood by his side a lovely Princess in grey satin and pearls; while the yellow nose with a splash & a gurggle fell into the fountain, & a hand came up from below, & flourishing thrice in the air, drew it under the water, & disappeared.

Instantly a coal black charger st with flowing mane & tail stood by the side of the Prince, while a milk white Palfrey stood by the side of the

G.M.P.
1888

Prince, & as he stooped to kiss her upturned face. He placed her dainty foot on the palm of his hand, & sprang into the saddle; then, grasping his Charger's mane, with one bound he seated himself on its back, & immediately large wings like those of a swan grew out of the shoulders of the horses. Side by side, away they flew over land & sea, till they reached the far country where the Prince was born.

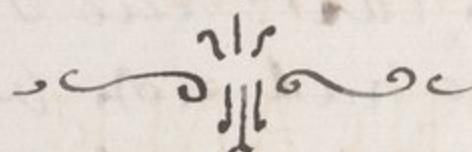

The horses stopped of themselves at the Castle gates, & the Prince & Prince, entering in hand in hand found the empty throne within the empty Hall, & mounting the dais,

They sat them down, the people thronging with acclamations around their Prince for whom they had kept the throne vacant for all these years. And the first of all that surging crowd to welcome back the Prince, were his good old Foster-parents, who had spent their time in nothing else but in sweeping & garnishing the State apartments, for as they had a shrewd suspicion that some Kings were fools, they did not see why the reverse should not hold good, & some fools be Kings,— especially if they were Court Fools.—

But I have an idea that it was not because he was a fool, even a Court Fool, but because he was wise, & gentle, & humble, & loving, & carried a beautiful soul in his marred body, that he came to his throne at last. and I am sure that if she had not been all these, she would not (as she did) have submitted to the life of a beggar maiden that she might save one whom at that time he did not even know, from his life of sorrow and ignominy. and I strongly suspect, (don't you?) that it was some good fairy after all who sent her fish to the fountain's brink; & I almost think that it may have been

that same good fairy who gave her the fly push which she always declared that she felt, that threw her into the water, & brought the Prince to the knowledge of his love.

"And what became of the yellow nose?" asked my little Nephews & Niece when I first told them this story.

Turn over to the next page and you shall hear—

WHAT BECAME
of the
YELLOW
NOSE

W.H.W.
H.M.A.D.
to
W.H.W.
H.M.A.D.

E.M.P.
1888.

When the wicked Fairy found that the spell was broken, & that the Prince had regained his original shape, & married the beautiful Princess, she was in a great rage: & one thing at least she determined, & that was to get hold of the yellow nose. "For," said she to herself, "it will be odd if I should live for another thousand years without wanting the nose for somebody." So she betook herself in no very amiable frame of mind, to the Fountain, and leaning over it murmured some strange fairy words, and sprinkled a few grains of salt into the water. In a moment the water began to heave & bubble & fizz, & suddenly up came the yellow nose. But something happened that the old fairy had by no means bargained for, for just as she had stretched out her hand to take it, with a spring & a wriggle it jumped out of the water & fixed itself on to her own face, & do what she would she could not get it off again. She spoke to it in very ill-sounding fairy language,

She pronounced every spell that she could think of. She even tried to tear it off, but she only succeeded in making the skin round it very sore, the nose remained as firm as ever.

I can fancy that when a fairy is frightened, she is more so than other people. We are so used to finding things beyond our control, that if we have tried our best to get ourselves out of a difficulty & don't succeed we sit down with a good grace, & submit. But a fairy is no used to ruling fate that when on some occasion, fate rules her, she is pretty sure to lose her presence of mind as well as her temper & be thoroughly scared.

It was so in this case, and it was not long before the Fairy learnt a lesson never to be forgotten, on the danger of playing with yellow noses.

So afraid was she of the jeers of her fellow fairies, that she now never dared to venture out by day light, & she was not fond even of a full moon, but she would creep out in the dark, wrapping a shawl carefully over the hated feature, lest some ray of light from a cottage window should flicker upon it, & betray its presence. She would pace up & down in a wild state of terror & dismay.

At length one night, muffling her face up as usual, she went to the Blacksmith's Smithy, & stood for a few minutes watching the boy at work upon the bellows.

"Blacksmith" she said at last
"can you melt copper?"

"Well mum," said the Blacksmith
"I should be ashamed of my furnace if I couldn't."

"Blacksmith, can you use your hammer & your anvil well?"

The man's answer was to bare his arm & taking up a bar of iron to lay it on his anvil & split it at a blow.

"Blacksmith," said the Fairy lowering her shawl "could you get rid of this for me?"

The Blacksmith started back several yards when he saw the yellow nose, but he did not lose his presence of mind. "Well mum" he remarked "it will be a toughish job, but a blow or two from my hammer will settle it I think, & if not we can melt it off, but it will be a bit painful for you mum."

"Never mind me" said the Fairy "I can bear it" So she laid her nose on the cold anvil, & the Blacksmith dealt a sturdy blow. The nose leaped upon the anvil but it did not break. Again & again the hammer descended till the Blacksmith wiped the sweat from his brow, but not a whit the worse was the yellow nose.

Then he blew up his fire to an extra heat & the Fairy laid her nose on the red hot coals while the Blacksmith worked at the bellows with might & main.

The nose got red hot, but it did not melt; the nose got white hot, but it did not melt. Then the Blacksmith took his pincers, & seizing the end of it tried to wrench it off, but he only succeeded in drawing it out a little longer; the nose remained as firmly fixed as ever; only it was battered & pulled

& melted out of shape, & there was nothing for it but for the Fairy to muffle herself up in her shawl and take herself off nose and all.

I do not know how long it takes for a yellow nose to recover from such rough treatment; but after a time the Fairy, muffled up as before, appeared in the Carpenter's shop.

"Carpenter" said she "have you got a grindstone?"

"I should rather think I have ma'am" said the Carpenter.

"Carpenter," she continued,
"have you ever held anyone's nose to the grindstone?"

"Well no ma'am, I can't say as ever I did, but I've often longed to do it."

"Then have your wish" exclaimed the Fairy throwing off her shawl & displaying the yellow nose in all its deformity.

The Carpenter gasped for breath for he had never seen such a nose before; but being a man of few words he kept silence & pumped upon the stone.

The fairy with her own hands held her nose to the grindstone.
Whizz, whizz, whizz, round went the stone, & sparks flew out in all directions, but except for a long scratch down the bone of it, it had no effect.

upon the nose.

The Carpenter paused to take breath, & I am told that finding it hopeless to part with the nose after this fashion the Fairy (very sensibly) produced a bottle of vaseline, & put some on the raw, after which, again muffling herself up in her shawl she disappeared.

One more attempt the Fairy made to get rid of the trouble-some appendage, & this time she went to the Doctor.

"Doctor," she said, "have you ever cut off a nose?"

"Madam" replied the Doctor with a low bow "I have never had the privilege of performing that operation on a personage of your distinction, but there are certain maiden ladies whose noses are in every body's business but their own, on whom I should have great pleasure in operating.

The Fairy felt too low in her mind to resent this speech, so she only dropped her shawl & said "Can you take off this for me?"

The Doctor quite unprepared for such a sight, paused before he replied, then, with less assurance he added "Madam the operation would be both painful & difficult to perform, indeed I doubt whether any instrument in my possession would be found capable of removing such a

- a - hem .. such an ornameat, without too much distress to your lady ship's feelings." (you see the nose whatever else it did, commanded respect, & the Fairy had risen from "madam" to "my lady" in consequence of the possession of it) "but," continued he; "I think perhaps other measures might succeed, & the skilful application of Carbolic acid might in time remove it."

So saying he produced a large bottle, & plunging a brush as big as that of a Bill-sticker into the liquid, he proceeded to paint the nose. Large blisters rose all over it & the skin of the nose turned brown. Then he painted it again, & the skin of the nose turned red; then he painted it a third time, & the skin of the nose turned pink. But nothing that he could do to it would have any further effect; & the Fairy kept a pink nose to her dying day.

And if you don't believe that that is the effect of carbolic acid, ask Aunt Judy.

and a number of other things that would have been in the house at the time of the burning of the house. The piano had a very bad
case and was not
worth repairing. The
piano had a very bad
case and was not
worth repairing. The
piano had a very bad
case and was not worth repairing.

THE
STORY
of the
STORM DWARF.

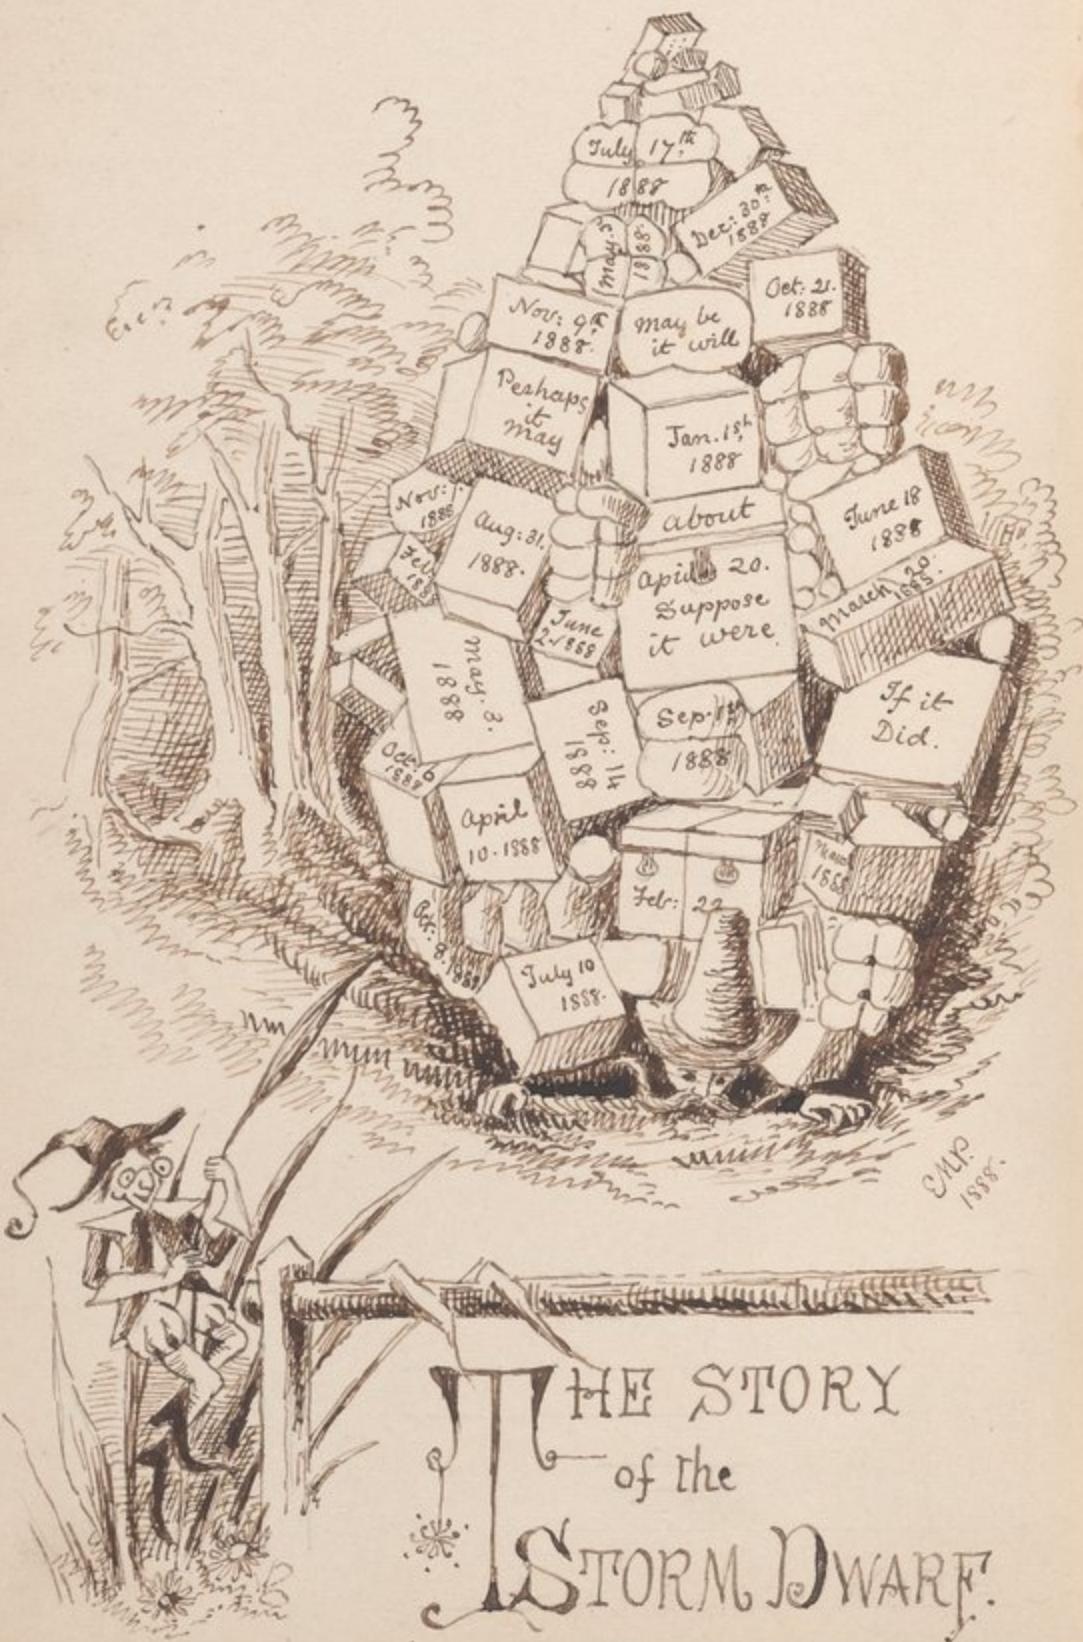

HEAT

YESTER

MANAGEMENT

It was a bright August morning when I started for a walk thro: a thick wood feeling glad of the shade which the trees afforded.
I had not gone far however when the wind rose & began to chafe in the tops of the trees, sighing & moaning as though it was in distress. Soon a few heavy drops of rain fell, & by & bye a growl of thunder sounded in the distance followed by the rushing of a shower.

There seemed to me something strange in the sudden gathering & breaking of the storm, for the sky had been cloudless when I started but half an hour before, & I could not get rid of the idea that in the sighing & the wind, the growl of the thunder, & the rush of the rain was mingled the sound of a human voice. While I was straining my ears to catch ~~the~~ words that seemed mingled with the storm, I heard a voice from the ground at my feet call out in a squeaky treble, "Never mind stranger, it's only the Storm Dwarf remodelling himself."

I looked down, & seated on a toad stood close by, I saw an Imp about the size of a grasshopper, & with such a green skin, such thin legs, & such an impudent air, that I was not quite sure that it was not really a grasshopper till I saw that he wore a pointed cap, & carried a gold headed cane in his hand. He put up a pair of eye glasses too, & gave me a knowing wink through them as who should say "you don't know the Storm Dwarf don't you ? what an ignorant fellow you are to be sure". Then he dropped his eye glasses & added "Eh!". The interjection was said so sharply that I started, & must have jumped a foot.

from the ground.

"If you don't know him already, you'd better make his acquaintance" added the Imp with a curious chuckle.

I was now getting out of the woodland path, & for some minutes the words which I had seemed to hear muttering in the storm had been growing clearer, & now they sounded like this,

Ivthrndrddsxtfobrdnstbr, Ivetreehundredandsixtyfive burdens to bear,

Ive-three-hundred-and-sixty-five burdens to bear,

Ive three hundred and sixty five burdens to bear,

Ive three hundred and sixty five burdens to bear.

IVE THREE HUNDRED AND SIXTY FIVE BURDENS TO BEAR.

As these words were shouted in my ears the path suddenly ended, & I came out upon a smooth piece of lawn, where a most curious sight met my eye. A huge pile of boxes bags, parcels & bundles of every conceivable shape & size, bound together on to the back of a poor little Dwarf who was lying prunting & struggling beneath their weight, upon the ground, only his head and hands being visible. Now & then he would give a convulsive leave, while his eyes poured down tears like rain, his sighs went up like the wind, his laboured breath like the clouds, & his constant moan of distress "I've three hundred and sixty five burdens to bear," like the mutterings of the thunder, & I soon discovered that the storm from which I had been suffering arose entirely from the tribulation of this overladen Dwarf.

I rushed to his rescue at once & began with all my might to strain & tug at the knot that tied them together, seeing at a glance that this would be the quickest way to deliver the poor little Dwarf from his burden.

A jibing voice at my side exclaimed with a chuckle

"He won't thank you for your interference, Eh!" and as I started at the sharp "Eh!" with which the sentence concluded I recognised my grasshopper friend who had followed me unobserved, & having climbed up a reed unspessing out at me from behind its leaves with a derisive laugh; & I thought - I only thought - with his first finger laid on the side of his nose!

I had no time to argue with the Imp, for the poor little Duay was contorting himself in the most wonderful way, twisting & writhing now this way now that, & with every movement the whole burden heaved & swayed & the knot tightened under my very hands.

"If you could bear it just a moment without moving I passed. I could untie the cord, but every time you wiggle you make the knot tighter."

"I told you he wouldn't thank you, Eh!" exclaimed the jibing voice at my side: & certainly the Dwarf did not seem to try to second my efforts. However at length with great difficulty I loosened the cord, the huge burden fell apart, & owl crawled the miserable creature, ironed perfectly flat, so that his stomach touched his back.' It was a relief after I had been released for a few minutes to see him swelling out like an India-rubber ball.

As soon as this was accomplished, the rain & thunder ceased, but the day continued cloudy & dull, & the poor little Dwarf didn't brighten up much -

And now I had time to examine the separate parcels of which this mountainous burden was composed.

They were a most curious medley. Here a box, there a bundle, & there again a parcel; & not only were they all shapes

but also of all sizes and weights; & I soon discovered that every separate parcel had its own date affixed.
For instance one was dated Jan: 1st 1888. & this was a fair sized box which if it had to be carried all day, would certainly make one's arm ache a little. Next to that however I picked up an ostrich feather round the quill of which was wrapped a label dated Jan: 2nd 1888. Then came a shape-less bundle more cumbersome than heavy with the date March 10th. Then a tiny, tiny, tiny parcel wrapped up in silver paper which held only an atom of dust off a butterfly; wring. It required a magnifying glass to read the date, which was December 1st 1888.

all the parcels of whatever shape or kind were docketted but some were in a different handwriting from others, & all in this handwriting were loose, untidy, & very large. and invariably when I opened them they proved to be either actually empty, or filled with a light powdery dust that flew up with a little puff - ff - ff the moment they were opened. Their date too was generally very vague & lengthy. One was lettered "Suppose it does" & dated "about April 20th" and this "Perhaps it may" and

dated "Somewhere between Feb: 6th & March 12th an-
-This 'May be in will, & so on.

While I was examining the parcels & arranging them in order according to their dates, the Dwarf watched my operations with a depressed, nay to say only air; and when I exclaimed "Who on earth can have been so cruel as to tie all these together & load a poor little creature with the whole burden at once?" the Imp laughed so immoderately that he fell backwards off the reed, & broke his eye glass which silenced him for a moment. However when I next looked up, he was com-posedly taking a pair of Ae tortoise shell spectacles out of a Shagreen case & fitting them on to his nose.

As I had received no answer to my question from the world in general, I turned to the Dwarf himself. & addressing him with the respect due to one who had suffered much said, "Tell me, my friend who was the wretch who so cruelly bound this heavy burden upon your back?"

The Dwarf turned his shoulder to me, and putting one finger into his mouth with a discontented air muttered "I don't know."

"Eh?" squeaked the Imp at my side.

But can't you tell me" I asked, "who tied them together?"

Very unwillingly the Dwarf mumbled "I did".

"My good friend" I exclaimed in amazement "what could make you do that?"

I don't know" muttered the Dwarf again.

"Speak up" shouted the Imp, after which he did that with his tongue which it is very rude to do, & shut his mouth with a snap.

The Dwarf looked exceedingly uncomfortable, & shuffling uneasily from one foot to the other said. "It was such a bother taking one every day."

"And where did these extraordinary empty parcels come from?" I asked.

"He made 'em himself, Eh!" shouted the Imp, laughing till the tears streamed down his face, & he had to take off his spectacles & wipe them before he could see through them.

"Impossible!" I cried.

"Ask him," said the Imp, "he knows its true." Then he tumbled head over heels & took an observation: (He was not a well mannered Imp!)

"Is this so?" I asked.

The Dwarf muttered something inaudible, & gave a sulky kick to a stone at his feet. at which the Imp raised his hand to his head with a gesture of despair, and tucked his head into his pocket.

I confess that I was by this time rather out of patience with the Dwarf; so I proceeded to pick out from the pile all the burden for the day (Aug: 31st) & to strap it on to his back, with the remark that it seemed to me he chiefly made his own burdens."

I then begged him to help me to dispose of the rest, putting by once & forever those of the past year with the exception of the Ostrich feather (which giving a cheerful aspect to affairs I stuck into his hat,) & sorting out the shapeless masses of "Supposes", "Perhapses" & "Probables", which I invariably found exploded as soon as they were brought into the light of day. There then remained only those from Aug^t. 31st to Dec. 30th, each one of which was clearly dated, & intended to be carried on its own day alone.

E.H.P.
1888

After a few cheerful remonstrances with the Duxy, & a promise to help him in the future to tie each burden on as comfortably as possible, I contrived to get a smile out of the poor little peevish face: instantly the clouds rolled away & when I looked round for my queer little friend the Imps. he was gone: only I saw hanging on a blade of grass the tortoiseshell spectacles. but when I stooped to pick them up they turned into two glittering raindrops left by the shower.

I have contrived to see something of the Dwarf every day since we first made acquaintance, and each day I help him on with his burdew: but sometimes I still see an inclination to take two or more at once, & I shall have I fear, to keep a good look out on Jan. 1st 1889. lest my little friend should from old habit, proceed to tie together the whole year's allowance into one burden & so make the weather of 1889, as cloudy and dull as that of 1888-

and back down and you get a longer tail. He comes down and you should see the sun and he comes down and then he will come up again.

